Since you blew my off today :), I want to do an update by email.

Before I attempt to get final approval for including your french and german clients in the OSR-2 update for those languages I need some information from you:

First, I want to confirm that no competitive browser or company will be pointed to from your site

Second, I need you to confirm that our current browsers will be in a premium place so that users can upgrade their clients to use them if they want AND that either this works or you will ensure that it does. (i have been told by some people that you can not use our current browsers with your current clients)

Third, pls specify what other measures you are planning to support IE. I can't recall and did not seem to write down everything you discussed

Also, in general we still need to understand how your client handles the situation of a english client in australia, a french client in canada etc.

OEM

>I will fax you the language MS is presenting to OEMs. Of course we >can't guarantee that every OEM will sign the language as is, but we are >serious about this. AOL must keep this language (and this email) confidential. David pls don't forward this around AOL.

>There are a very very few number of OEMs with preexisting contracts and >those OEMs might not sign the language as i fax to you. Even in these >very few cases, however, the preexisting contracts include language >which covers the same ground but not in such detail. We feel relatively >comfortable that even under the preexisting language, an OEM couldn't >remove icons under the old agreements. In fact, MS recently threatened >to terminate an OEM (which has preexisting language) which tried to >remove icons and the OEM reversed course.
